

Monday a.m. -- November 7, 2022

From Chris Temple - Editor/Publisher --

Greetings!

At the just-concluded Money Show in Orlando, among the old friends, colleagues and covered companies on hand was Amex Exploration and its C.E.O./President Victor Cantore and I.R. director Wanda Cutler.

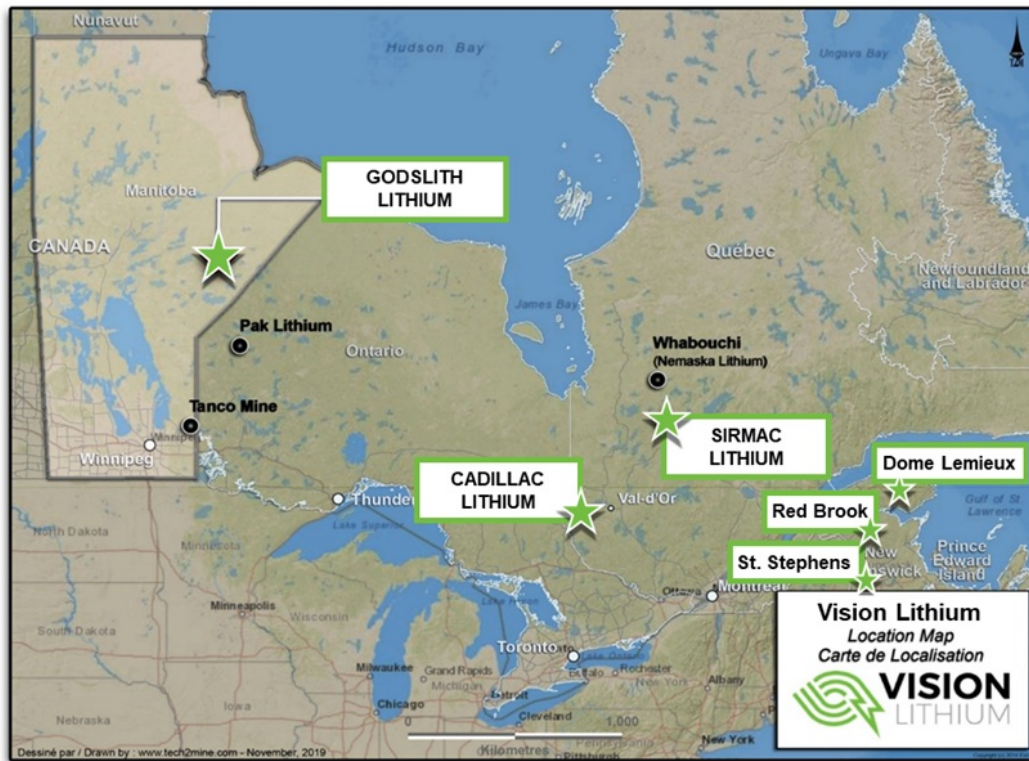

Of course, we all wanted to learn about Amex's plans for the potential timing of a resource estimate (the mid-way point of 2023 or a bit later, Victor reminded me, as I already suggested in my recent Precious Metals issue.) That, of course, remains a premiere exploration story in the gold space.

But even more I wanted to get up to speed on another of Victor's companies: Vision Lithium (TSXV-VLI; OTCQB-ABEPF), which is started now as a Speculative BUY.

It closed strongly last week, at C15.5 cents/share (US11.5 cents/share). But despite Friday's sharp gain, VLI shares remain well below their highs of the last couple years.

Other than uranium over the last couple years or so, we've also made HUGE money on lithium-related stocks: Piedmont and Frontier. Both remain BUYS and both have some great days ahead of themselves. In the next regular issue, I'll have comments on both.

I've been looking for other elite battery metals stories to add; and a few others are at the top of my shopping list. But after spending a lot of time on Vision with Victor in Orlando (he is that company's Chairman) it's the one I feel most urgently that I want to pull the trigger on.

Cantore and his crew have been acquiring a few very prospective lithium projects, attempting to capitalize not only on the bullish tailwinds for that key substance but also on Canada's fostering of that industry.

At THIS PAGE you can see some of the company's recent news: on new acquisitions as well as some early and encouraging exploration news, especially on its Cadillac Project. I'm very much of a mind that Vision has the potential for pivotal news on a few different fronts in the months ahead; and I have confidence in Victor as well. As things move--and as lithium-related equities recover from the funk of recent months--I think Vision could give us outsized gains.

I'll soon have more detailed comments. For now, I suggest you REGISTER HERE for an online webinar tomorrow featuring several different lithium-related companies, and hosted by PI Financial.

Vision specifically will be featured at 2:20 p.m. Eastern time (so this doesn't conflict with my own two gigs tomorrow you already know about!)

---

My timing certainly wasn't perfect getting back into UNG and BOIL this go-round as during the couple times prior. But happily (at least for us investment-wise; it's another matter how much ALL our utility bills will be rising) natural gas has spurted back strongly the last few trading days.

This morning it's back around $7.00/mcf, up another 9% and now 35% or so above its exaggerated low of about 2 weeks ago. That low, as I said recently, came as seemingly every conceivable bearish factor (near-term anyway) coalesced.

But forecasts of colder weather finally in much of the US has shorts covering their bets, so many traders here having all shifted to the same side of the proverbial boat in recent days.

How much more of a rally we're going to get remains to be seen, though I think we might still get some.

Given, however, this sharp rally I am going to a HOLD on both BOIL and UNG. No new money should be put here for now until we see how much staying power this move will have, etc...something I'll be attempting to flesh out quickly.

All the best,

Chris Temple -- Editor/Publisher

---

"You can get information anywhere...but here, you get KNOWLEDGE!"